Assignment Instructions

Week 3 - Part II Project

- Make a copy of the file Apocalypse_Revised.html within the Fonts folder under the Chapter 06 folder in the Aptana project files. When you make the copy, name it week3project2.html . Last week I included a short video about how to copy, paste and rename files in Aptana called Copy and Paste HTML Files In Aptana Studio. I have again included that video in the Videos and Supplemental Materials folder below for your reference. Please review those materials if you need refresher.
- Edit the page to include FIVE alterations that keep the general content of the page but adds customization that you feel enhance the page based on any of the following concepts covered in this week's materials:
- Rounded corner boxes
- Box backgrounds
- Shadows
- Gradients
- Transitions
- Transforms
- Web Fonts
- Your email to me must include details about what features were used and the actual code segments you used to implement the feature / adjustment

When completed, this file should be uploaded to the server.

Be sure you validate your code on the W3C validator and correct any errors. You do NOT need to correct warnings but do be aware of warnings.

This assignment is worth 25 points. Once you have completed this portion of the assignment, Submit the URL using the submission button below AND be sure you also include a summary and code segments for the FIVE enhancements / alterations you added to the page (as described above).

How the World Could End

Scenarios that spell the end of life as we know it

Right now, you're probably feeling pretty good. After all, life in the developed world is comfortable—probably more comfortable than it's been for the average human being throughout all of recorded history.

Will you be the last person standing if one of these apocalyptic scenarios plays out?

But don't get too smug. There's still plenty of horrific ways it could all fall apart. In this article, you'll learn about a few of our favorites.

Mayan Doomsday

Skeptics suggest that the Mayan calendar simply rolls to a new 5,126-year era after 2012, and doesn't actually predict a life-ending apocalypse. But given that the long-dead Mayans were wrong about virtually everything else, why should we trust them on this?

Robot Takeover

Not quite as frightening as a Vampire Takeover or Living-Dead Takeover, a robot rebellion is still a disquieting thought. We are already outnumbered by our technological gadgets, and even Bill Gates fears the day his Japanese robot slave turns him over by the ankles and asks (in a suitably robotic voice) "Who's your daddy now?"

> "We don't know how the universe started, so we can't be sure it won't just end, maybe today."

Unexplained Singularity

We don't know how the universe started, so we can't be sure it won't just end, maybe today, and maybe with nothing more exciting than a puff of anti-matter and a slight fizzing noise.

Runaway Climate Change

Dismissed by some, Al Gore's prophecy of doom may still come true. If it does, we may have to contend with vicious storms, widespread food shortages, and surly air conditioning repairmen.

Global Epidemic

Some time in the future, a lethal virus could strike. Predictions differ about the source of the disease, but candidates include monkeys in the African jungle, bioterrorists, birds and pigs with the flu, warriors from the future, an alien race, hospitals that use too many antibiotics, vampires, the CIA, and unwashed brussel sprouts. Whatever the source, it's clearly bad news.

These apocalyptic predictions do not reflect the views of the author.
